What's underfoot

Surface across the three walking days

Glenmalure — Ireland's wildest glacial valley

You'll arrive at one of Ireland's most sacred monastic sites where round towers stand sentinel over valley and lake.

Glendalough — 1,400 years in a single valley

Walking into Glendalough on Day 2 is one of those moments that justifies multi-day hiking. You descend through forest and then the valley opens below you: two glacial...

Lough Tay — the Guinness Lake

The moment Lough Tay appears below you on Day 3 is one of the great sights of the Wicklow Way. Cupped in a bowl of granite mountain, its waters are deep and dark —...

Djouce Mountain and the Dublin Bay panorama

Your final full walking day takes you over Djouce Mountain — 725 metres, with the ground falling away in every direction.

Arrival in Glenmalure. Settle in. The mountains are already waiting. Your tour begins in Glenmalure — not in a city hotel lobby, but in one of the most secluded and spectacular valleys in Ireland. Glenmalure is remote, so we recommend a...

Overnight Glenmalure

DAY

2

16 km 471 m up

● Moderate

Glenmalure to Glendalough/Laragh

Your first full walking day climbs immediately out of Glenmalure's sheltered floor and onto the open mountain. The path rises through a pine forest before breaking onto an exposed hillside—and with every hundred metres of ascent, the view behind you expands. Tonelagee's broad flank guides you northward across open moorland, where the wind has a different quality to the valley air: colder, cleaner, with the smell of peat and distance.

Overnight Glendalough / Laragh

3

16.2 km 490 m up

● Moderate

Glendalough to Lough Tay / Roundwood

Leave Glendalough heading north and west, climbing steadily through the old oak woodland above the Upper Lake before the trees thin and the mountain proper begins. The ascent to Spink's long ridge rewards you with views across the valley you've just left, back to the Glenmalure slopes, and south toward the Blackstairs Mountains on the Carlow border. Then the landscape shifts: open moorland, granite outcrops, the sky wide open in every direction.

4

19.5 km 603 m up

● Moderate

Lough Tay to Enniskerry

Your final full walking day begins with the mountains still around you and ends with Dublin Bay on the horizon — one of the great transitions in Irish hiking. The path climbs from Roundwood back onto the Wicklow plateau, and the ascent to Djouce Mountain (725 m) is steady and open: excellent ground underfoot, views building with every step. From Djouce's summit, the landscape breaks dramatically to the north, featuring the Sugar Loaf's sharp cone in the middle distance, Bray Head jutting into the sea beyond, and Dublin Bay glittering in whatever light the day has offered.

Departure from Enniskerry. Onwards, with memories that outlast the muscle soreness. A leisurely final morning in Enniskerry — there's no rush. When you're ready, head back to Dublin airport or the city centre — there are regular buses from Enniskerry, and we can arrange a private transfer as an optional add-on if...
